When one enters an art gallery one becomes aware that everything inside it is part of the marvellous world of contemporary art, and every anomaly or mystery can be transformed by this space. The art space is the explanation itself, as a “limit” of the work, or its range. The gallery becomes a hinge with a double defence: defending the work of art from possible ‘pollution’ from the outside world, and at the same time, defending the viewer warning him that in its interior everything can be ‘true’. The architecture of the space has a double value: firstly to enrich the work of art such as a frame usually does, secondly, to create the context where the artistic action takes place.

Incorrect spaces wants to understand how the frame of the exhibition’s space is now becoming like a “descendant” of the traditional frame of the painting. The exhibition makes a connection with the works of four artists of Rome and plays on the comfort/discomfort aspect of the exhibition’s space that not always is in favour of the art, but often a dangerous protection for artistic research. The great multiplication of the exhibition’s spaces seems to be the only important element of the art system, rather than a real analysis of the exhibition spaces’ evolution as a processing of contents. Incorrect spaces invite you to live “uncomfortably” an exhibition in which the work can become the physical or mental obstacle.
